State of Loc Nation Restitution Report

2026 Annual Report | Inaugural Issue

Publisher State of Loc Nation Global Public Benefit Corporation (SOLN GPBC)

Author, Framer, Architect and initiative lead Rev. Dr. Christina Loren Clement, Founder and President

ORCID iD 0009-0004-7839-1133

Next issue 2026 Year-End Issue, expected at the end of December 2026

Abstract

This inaugural issue documents SOLN's progress from restitution research and advocacy to a published proposal for amending H.R. 40 and an organizational map that assigns responsibilities for carrying the work forward. It also records a first-hand observation from the author's 2024 US Presidential campaign and 2026 write-in campaign for U.S. Congress in Georgia and describes how the report will track access to certified write-in candidate lists. The issue distinguishes completed work, including publication and role assignments, from proposed claims administration, community restoration, and LND payment arrangements. The December year-end issue will track legislative follow-up, organizational participation, project submissions, county-level election records, and payment-pilot readiness.

Keywords Restitution, H.R. 40, voter access, write-in candidates, community economic restoration, Loc Nation Dollar, Christina Loren Clement

Table of Contents

State of Loc Nation Restitution Report 1

Abstract . . . . . 1

1. Why I launched this report during the midterms . . . . . 3

From Seeking Relief to Building a Restitution Framework . . . . . 5

Washington, D.C. | The federal court case . . . . . 5

What I sought in the D.C. case . . . . . 6

Why the election-year timing mattered to me . . . . . 6

Why I established the SOLN Supreme Court . . . . . 6

Georgia and federal outreach | Where I sought help and what happened 7

The constitutional work | What I wrote and how it connects to the code 8

International recognition | What the public record shows . . . . . 8

What SOLN is building from this experience . . . . . 9

Campaign finance records . . . . . 10

2. Sources and reporting approach . . . . . 11

Daily Documentation and Social Media Access . . . . . 11

3. Documented progress and observations . . . . . 12

3.1 International recognition . . . . . 13

3.2 Legislative publication . . . . . 14

3.3 Organizational assignments . . . . . 14

3.4 Write-in voter access . . . . . 15

4. Proposed implementation and oversight . . . . . 16

5. Next issue and reporting commitments . . . . . 17

References . . . . . 17

1. Why I launched this report during the midterms

I launched this report after the 2026 midterms to put three things on the record: what I presented to voters, what I observed as a write-in candidate, and how the restitution work would continue after Election Day.

My 2024 presidential campaign and my 2026 write-in campaign for U.S. Congress in Georgia centered on restitution. I presented a plan to address documented harms, direct investment toward historically redlined and underfunded communities, and use the Loc Nation Dollar (LND) as a means of exchange, parallel to USD. LEI 984500AFF75RB77E9551. I published the legislative text so voters, lawmakers, and community leaders could examine how the plan would handle eligibility, claims, remedies, funding, and oversight. What an Amended HR 40 Looks Like: The SOLN Restitution Act 2024 ISBN-13 979-8167434394

As a young adult, I watched Beverly Hills, 90210 and wanted the freedom I saw those teenagers have. They had room to make friends, figure out who they were, and imagine what camenext. In my own life, I experienced what I felt was targeted stop-and-frisk policing, walked through metal detectors, and saw what it meant for a community to go without adequate funding. That level of stress should never take up so much space in the mind of a child or young adult. Why were we different?

I grew up hearing, “The streets will eat you up.” I want this framework to end the conditions that made that warning sound inevitable. A young person should be able to walk to school, find a mentor, get a first job, and plan a future without spending so much energy figuring out how to get through the day.

We live in a modern society. Our systems for helping people should reflect that. A family facing housing instability should know where to turn before losing its home. A young person looking for work should have a clear path from training to a paid opportunity. A neighborhood that has endured decades of underinvestment should be able to show what it needs, see who is responsible for delivering it, and track whether the resources arrived.

If America is an experiment in self-government, consider SOLN a parallel system for putting these commitments into practice. Through the SOLN Code, the published H.R. 40 amendment proposal, and the community assignments in this report, I have built a framework with defined responsibilities, a process for reviewing claims, and public reporting on what gets delivered. I want a young person growing up in the same conditions I knew to have the time and freedom to think about who they want to become.

Another reason I began this research came directly from my salon. Clients told me about being treated differently because they wore locs. As the author and teacher of Locs Linked to Spirituality, ISBN-13 979-8402061118, I understood that for some of my clients, locs carried spiritual meaning. I believed the treatment they described was wrong, and I wanted to understand what protections they could turn to and what still needed to change.

I began with online articles and definitions, then used court libraries and the Georgia State Law Library to study how the law addressed the issues my clients raised. I wanted to know how someone could document what happened, where they could bring a complaint, and what remedies they could ask for.

Those conversations helped shape the SOLN framework. A person who experiences discrimination for wearing locs should have a clear place to bring the concern, explain what their locs mean to them in their own words, and find out who will review it and what happens next. I began this research because clients in my salon told me they were being discriminated against for wearing locs. I wanted to understand what protections they had and what needed to change. I published that work in Revealed the Kingdom of Locs: Nazirite Vow Continues, Volume 1, and Volume 2 on August 3, 2023, and mailed copies to several government departments. I wanted officials to understand what my clients were experiencing and work with me to address it. I kept reaching doors that were shut tight.

That experience helped drive my decision to run for president of US in the 2024 election. My campaign committee was registered on November 17, 2023. I put in my bid because I wanted to get in front of those locked doors and be heard. I wanted the people living through the problem and the officials who could do something about it in the same conversation, so we could work out what needed to change together. Your children is my children and I sent the adoption to notice of the 196 entities to the various treaty offfices to make them aware and proceded to the next stept.

For 90 days, I fasted by eating only living foods. I felt the presence of God the entire time. As I listened to people, studied what they were facing, and put the framework in writing, I felt His guidance in each step.

I believe God guided this entire framework. That is part of the story of how it came to be. My faith called me to pay attention to what people were carrying and to take responsibility for what I did with what they entrusted to me. When someone told me how they had been treated for wearing locs, or described a grievance they had carried for years, I wanted to help build a way for their concern to be heard and acted on and my daughter” said, Mommy I wish you can wash rascism away.” and she will have that very wish.

When I think about how God led me through this work, I think about the birds and how God provides for them. I held on to that faith through several evictions and a Georgia DUI matter involving a “less safe” allegation. After the DUI incident, I gave up my car. That was a consequence I chose for myself because I wanted to take responsibility for what happened.

In the Georgia housing proceedings, I pleaded for help because I believed documents being used in the case were fraudulent. I wanted the court to examine those documents before I lost my housing. As I remember it, I was given two additional weeks beyond the seven days I had expected, and the balance owed was zero. The extra time mattered, but I still needed an answer to the concern I had raised about the documents.

Two Fulton County Magistrate Court dispossessory cases are part of this history:

• No. 24ED311260 — Circa Ecco TT LLC and Eos Real Estate Management v. Christina Clement. The court's public calendar lists a filing date of June 10, 2024, and a February 27, 2025, trial calendar date. Fulton County Magistrate Court calendar

•No. 26ED397109 — 1125 Hammond, LP, doing business as Sync at Perimeter, v. Christina Clement and all other occupants. In this proceeding, I documented the financial harm I was experiencing and sought equitable relief. These experiences shaped what I want SOLN's housing protections to do. When someone is facing displacement and disputes a document, there should be a clear way to submit that dispute and learn how it was addressed. The written decision should tell the person how much is owed, when they must act, and what options they have for review. A family needs those answers while it still has time to make decisions about where to live. Also, the cases submitted by prose must be actually read.

From Seeking Relief to Building a Restitution Framework

I began this work by asking existing institutions to address the harms I was documenting. I brought my claims to federal court in Washington, D.C., contacted federal and local offices in Georgia, pursued banking and employment, and sent written notices and supporting materials to domestic and international recipients. I exhausted the avenues I pursued through filings, requests for reconsideration and review, public notices, and direct outreach. The responses I received, and the requests that went unanswered, helped me identify what a restitution program would need to do differently.

Washington, D.C. | The federal court case

In February 2024, I brought Clement v. Garland, No. 1:24-cv-00479-RC, in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. I sought judicial relief through the filings in that case. The district court dismissed my claims without prejudice on October 28, 2024, shortly before the November election, and denied reconsideration on November 12, 2024. I appealed in No. 24-5263 and sought an injunction, expedited review, and, in the alternative, mandamus relief.

On March 19, 2025, the D.C. Circuit affirmed the dismissal and denial of reconsideration. It held that my complaint did not meet the federal pleading standard requiring a short and plain statement showing entitlement to relief. The court denied the injunction and dismissed the expedited and alternative mandamus requests as moot. I came away from that process with a specific design priority for SOLN's framework. A claimant should be able to identify the qualifying harm, submit evidence in an accessible format, receive a written determination, and understand how to seek review. D.C. Circuit judgment, is what they said. All while three, 3 default judgements are owed and all prayer for relief. Silence Aquiscence and proceeded.

What I sought in the D.C. case

I pursued three default judgments that I am entitled to receive. I proceeded on the position that silence in response to my notices and filings amounted to acquiescence. That was the basis on which I continued to pursue relief. I did not receive the three judgments I sought in that case but it opened the door to establish our own tribunal. https://archive.org/details/@state_of _loc_nation_court_docs

Why the election-year timing mattered to me

I was running for president as an independent that year. In my view, the pleading issue the courts ultimately identified could have been addressed months earlier. An earlier decision would have given me more time to respond and decide how to proceed while the campaign was underway but instead it was intentionally delayed and no notice to the press was distributed especially with four notable defendants. They would have been able to provide relief sooner than later.

The D.C. Circuit's judgment says the panel considered the record and my brief. From my perspective, the decision left the substance of my restitution claims and the grounds for the default judgments I sought unanswered. After pursuing relief in the district court, asking for reconsideration, and appealing, I turned to building a process that would address the gaps I experienced. D.C. Circuit judgment

Why I established the SOLN Supreme Court

That experience led me to establish the SOLN Supreme Court within SOLN's governance framework. I found a law that stated, it is that when a tribunal fails to provide meaningful protection, a nation has the right to establish institutions that serve its people's interests. For SOLN,that meant designing a process in which a claimant can file a claim, confirm receipt, see who is responsible for reviewing it, receive written reasons for a decision, and understand how to challenge it. Those are the safeguards I wanted to build because they address what I found missing in my own pursuit of relief. SOLN Black Code https://stateoflocnation.com/usblackcode-house-gov

Georgia and federal outreach | Where I sought help and what happened

The following accounts reflect some of my experience. The correspondence, notices, and filing receipts belong in the supporting record so readers can distinguish a written denial, an unanswered request, and a submission whose delivery I could not confirm.

| Where I sought action | What I did and what I experienced |
|---|---|
| Tax and IRS matters | I filed tax-related submissions and raised concerns about what I believed was retaliation. The relief I requested was declined. |
| Federal investigative and congressional offices | I sought assistance from the FBI and both Georgia U.S. senators' offices. They declined assistance. I also requested contact or an appointment through Representative Hank Johnson's office. I received neither a return message nor an appointment. But both were present for the Monks walk for peace. |
| County and municipal offices | I contacted the Fulton County task force and city halls in Atlanta, Decatur, and East Point. I did not receive a substantive response or assistance from those contacts. |
| Banking and employment | My attempts to open a bank account for the work were declined. I also received several employment rejection emails for positions I pursued based on my experience and qualifications. |
| Whistleblower reporting and unemployment | I filed a whistleblower complaint after raising concerns about possible wrongdoing in property management. I disputed the property manager's account of what happened and did not receive unemployment benefits. |
| Certified mail and international submissions | Several certified mailings lacked tracking updates sufficient for me to confirm delivery. I sent books intended for the International Court of Justice and received neither confirmation of delivery nor the returned copies. |

| Where I sought action | What I did and what I experienced |
|---|---|
| Public filings and notices | I filed lobbying disclosures and public notices and received a notarized affidavit. These records help establish what I submitted, when I submitted it, and what I can document about receipt. I also spent countless hours disputed libel narratives about my organization. |

The constitutional work | What I wrote and how it connects to the code

In The Completion of the Constitution and Federalist Papers: Revealed the Kingdom of Locs, Nazirite Vow Continues, Volume 3, I set out SOLN's replacement for the Three-Fifths Compromise within our constitutional framework. The principle is full political personhood, equal protection, and safeguards against the misuse of power. That is the basis for the protections I carried forward into SOLN's ongoing code. In U.S. constitutional history, the

The original three-fifths apportionment rule needed to be abolished and replaced with Black America Constitutional Framework. The Completion of the Constitution and Federalist Papers : Revealed the Kingdom of Locs Nazirite Vow Continues Volume 3 explains the framework I developed for SOLN and the protections I believe communities need today. Archived in the Library of Congress LCCN #'s 2025922369; 2025922368; 2026929815 The USBLACK Code is the ongoing public record of SOLN's framework. The SOLN GPBC Executive Orders archive records the directives I issued, including work on food access, lodging protections, majority protection, and LND operational readiness. What an Amended HR 40 Looks Like: The SOLN Restitution Act 2024 brings that work into a legislative proposal with provisions for claims review, land and property restoration, community investment, and financial oversight. Together, the publications let readers trace the work from principle to specific provisions and assignments. USBLACK Code · SOLN GPBC Executive Orders · Published H.R. 40 proposal

International recognition | What the public record shows

In 1999, Benin's President Mathieu Kérékou apologized to African Americans during a visit to a church in Baltimore for involvement in the transatlantic slave trade. The U.S. House of Representatives adopted an apology for slavery and racial segregation on July 29, 2008, through H. Res. 194. The U.S. Senate passed its own apology resolution on June 18, 2009, through S. Con. Res. 26. Benin apology · U.S. House resolution · U.S. Senate resolution

On May 25, 2026, Pope Leo XIV's encyclical Magnifica Humanitas was publicly presented. In it, he apologized for the Holy See's role in legitimizing slavery and its failure to condemn it for centuries. On October 28, 2026, participants at the Elevate Africa Convening in Accra, Ghana, signed the Accra Declaration in their personal capacities. They acknowledged the continuing harms of the transatlantic slave trade and called on states and institutions that benefited from it to take steps toward repair, including formal apologies. Vatican encyclical · Accra Declaration coverage

What SOLN is building from this experience

I lead this work through SOLN GPBC. The experiences documented here shape the program requirements. When a request goes unanswered, there should be a named person responsible for follow-up and a deadline. When a submission cannot be traced, there should be a receipt and a status record. When relief is denied, there should be a written reason and a clear review path. When communities need housing, employment, business capital, or financial access, there should be a way to submit a project, identify who will deliver it, and measure whether it reached the people it was meant to serve.

That is the purpose of the organizational assignments in this inaugural issue. The 2026 Year-End Issue, expected at the end of December 2026, will track who accepted responsibility, what moved forward, what remains unresolved, and what the community can expect next.

In March 2026, just before I was due in Savannah to speak at a Republican event, Navy Federal Credit Union had my car towed and took my entire paycheck. I called the branch looking for an explanation. I expected professionalism from Navy Federal, so the way the teller spoke to me was especially jarring. I felt like I was in The Twilight Zone. I filed a complaint with the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB), but I did not see a resolution. By then, my federal tax refund had already been withheld for student loans, even though I had previously received a letter showing a zero balance. Now my car was gone and so was my entire check, right before I needed to travel to speak. That was the point when I began to wonder whether I was being targeted. I did not know whether the incidents were connected. I remember asking myself, "Why would I be targeted when I'm trying to help?"

That experience shaped what I want SOLN's framework to provide. When someone loses access to their money or transportation and disputes the action, they should be able to get a written explanation, see the records the institution relied on, and know who can review the dispute. Those answers matter when someone still has to get to work, keep an appointment, or pay for a place to live, eat and provide for children. God did provide a way to still make it to the event and back.

What stayed with me was how little recourse I felt I had. When offices rely on one another's records and no one takes responsibility for checking the original decision, a person can follow every step and still get sent in circles. I wanted a genuinely independent reviewer who could examine the zero-balance letter alongside the record used to withhold the refund, give me a written answer, and explain what could be corrected. There also has to be a way to flag an emergency and get a timely response when someone's housing, transportation, or income is at stake. I saw another pattern in the conversations I had with people. When neighbors know one another, they can share information, help someone get to an appointment, or notice when several families are running into the same problem. When those relationships break down, the community loses one of its own resources, and each person is left to start from scratch. That is why the SOLN framework calls for both independent review of individual grievances and local liaisons who know their communities, can recognize recurring problems, and can help people find out who is responsible for following through.

In 2024, I ran for president as an independent candidate with restitution at the center of my campaign. I received no press coverage of my candidacy that I was aware of. I also encountered a familiar assumption that an independent candidate has already lost before voters hear what she stands for. That assumption affects who gets covered, who gets invited to speak, and whose ideas the public has a chance to consider.

Trying to qualify for the ballot made the barriers concrete. I had to work through different state deadlines, petition rules, and signature requirements. For a first-time independent candidate building a campaign from the ground up, meeting those demands across the country felt out of reach. I came away convinced that voters have fewer meaningful opportunities to hear from candidates outside the Democratic and Republican parties when ballot access, press attention, and campaign infrastructure are so heavily concentrated around those two parties. The Afro Community had podcast focused on other topics.

Campaign finance records

When I reviewed the Federal Election Commission (FEC) reports, I did not see the amount I attributed to my intellectual property (IP). I also did not see the daily expenses I incurred during my 2024 presidential campaign itemized in those reports. The IP valuation and the day-to-day campaign expenses are separate items. In 2026, when I ran as a Lincoln Republican before continuing my campaign for U.S. Congress in Georgia as a write-in candidate, I was invited to speak and was treated courteously. In the end, the people whose support I sought chose Collins. I believe my decision to keep restitution at the center of the campaign may have influenced that choice. That is my interpretation. I cannot speak for their individual reasons.

What I wanted them to see was how a framework centered on historically redlined and underfunded communities could also benefit people and businesses beyond the direct recipients. When families have stable housing, local businesses have customers and capital, and employers have access to a trained workforce, the effects reach suppliers, contractors, lenders, and employers across the wider economy. People who prefer to work privately or behind the scenes can participate through those channels. The program's criteria, commitments, and results should still be visible to the public.

Those two campaigns helped shape this report. I wanted readers to see what it took to put restitution before voters, where I encountered barriers, and how I carried the work forward after Election Day through published legislative language, community assignments, and a plan to report what gets delivered.

2. Sources and reporting approach

This issue draws on H.R. 40 as introduced, the United Nations resolution record, SOLN's published legislative proposal and organizational map, and my firsthand account from Hammond Park. The official records establish what was introduced in Congress and what the United Nations adopted. The SOLN materials document what we drafted and the responsibilities we assigned. My polling-place account records what I observed at one location. The county review asks whether a certified write-in candidate list can be located online through an official county source. The year-end issue will distinguish verified postings from cases awaiting confirmation and record the source and date of each verification. Polling-place observations will be recorded separately.

Daily Documentation and Social Media Access

I documented each step of this work daily on my social media platforms. TikTok has been my main platform. I have also shared updates through LinkedIn, the Dynasty Healing Corp. YouTube channel, and Facebook through a direct link.

I appear to be locked out of my Facebook and Instagram accounts because I have been unable to update them with my new phone number. On my mobile phone, I have still been able to use an old direct link to Facebook. This was after weird activity was happening on my old phone line.

3. Documented progress and observations

Over the course of this work, I spoke with hundreds of people. Some were clients at my salon. Others were Uber drivers or delivery workers, people I met while running errands, or participants in Zoom meetings and conferences. Some conversations lasted only a few minutes. Others gave people time to tell me what had happened, what they had already tried, and what they still needed.

I listened to people's grievances, demands, and hopes. Some wanted a specific wrong addressed. Others wanted to know whom they could turn to for help. Some simply needed someone to listen. I learned to ask what each person wanted to happen next, because two people could describe a similar problem and need very different responses.

These informal conversations helped shape how I designed SOLN's framework. I wanted people to be able to describe what happened in their own words, say what kind of help or remedy they wanted, and find out who was responsible for following up. A grievance can call for a review and a written decision. A need shared by several people can point to a community project. Sometimes the first step is simply to hear someone out before deciding what, if anything, they want done.

After speaking with hundreds of people, I kept coming back to one image. We were a scattered herd with no shepherd. People were doing what they could for their families and communities, but too often each person had to figure out alone where to turn.

That is part of why I built the SOLN framework. I wanted a person to be able to say what happened in their own words, decide what help they needed, and know who would get back to them. When several people raised the same concern, I wanted their experiences to inform a community project with someone responsible for carrying it out. I want people to be able to see who took responsibility, what they did, and whether it helped.

One of the most unexpected parts of this work was the reception I received. Most of the white individuals I introduced to the framework expressed genuine interest and told me they were impressed. At the same time, several Black organizations I approached declined my requests. That surprised me because I had hoped those organizations would be among the first to engage with a restitution framework built around the needs of Black communities.

I include this experience because it shaped how I organized the next phase of SOLN's work. Individual encouragement and institutional participation are two different things. The organizational assignments in this report give people a concrete way to move from interest to action. Each participating organization is asked to name a liaison, identify a project it can carry out, and report what it delivers. One of the most unexpected parts of this work was the reception I received. Most of the white individuals I introduced to the framework expressed interest and told me they wereimpressed. Several Black organizations I approached declined my requests. A few people joined me for announcements at city hall, and I appreciated their presence. When it came time to do the work between announcements, I largely carried it myself. At each step where I had asked for help, I had to learn what the work required and do it myself.

I recorded several interviews through StoryCorps to preserve the personal history behind this work in its archive at the Library of Congress. I also published Revealed the Kingdom of Locs: Nazirite Vow Continues, Volume 2, which includes an excerpt from the International Court of Justice's practitioner guide. I used the guide to identify the procedural requirements and completed the preparation steps I understood to apply. Those records preserve two parts of the same journey. The recordings tell the story in my own voice. The book shows the research and procedural work I was doing along the way.

I contacted the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and finance ministries in Africa and the Caribbean to discuss possible arrangements for settling debt obligations affecting African and Caribbean countries. I received no response to those inquiries. I then established SOLN Central Bank and designed its payment strategy around pursuing connections with the Pan-African Payment and Settlement System (PAPSS) and the Caribbean Payment and Settlement System (CAPSS). My objective is to begin circulation of the Loc Nation Dollar (LND) through participating institutions and merchants, starting with agreed onboarding and settlement terms, followed by testing before any launch.

That experience also shaped how I assigned the next phase of work. I had learned what happens when an initiative depends on informal encouragement and no one takes responsibility for the next step. Each participating organization is asked to name a liaison, identify one project it can carry out, and report what it delivers. The 2026 Year-End Issue, expected at the end of December, will record who stepped forward, what they took on, and how far the payment and community work progressed.

3.1 International recognition

On March 25, 2026, the United Nations General Assembly adopted Resolution A/RES/80/250, declaring the trafficking of enslaved Africans and racialized chattel enslavement of Africans the gravest crime against humanity. A/80/L.48 was the draft designation. SOLN recognizes the adopted resolution as a milestone in historical recognition. The work this report follows is how communities and institutions can define remedies, assign responsibility, and measure delivery. United Nations resolution record

3.2 Legislative publication

H.R. 40, as introduced in the 119th Congress, would establish a commission to study the harms of slavery and subsequent discrimination and recommend remedies to Congress. My publication, What an Amended HR 40 Looks Like: The SOLN Restitution Act 2024, presents SOLN's proposed legislative text for reviewing qualifying restitution claims, supporting lawful land and property restoration, and financing community economic restoration. The text is available for review alongside the bill introduced in Congress. This report will track legislative follow-up separately from publication. H.R. 40 as introduced · SOLN's published proposal

3.3 Organizational assignments

I lead the initiative through SOLN GPBC. The organizational map assigns responsibilities across America, Africa, and the Caribbean. Participation will be documented through designated liaisons, project submissions, and monthly progress reports. SOLN organizational map

| Area | Participants | Assignment |
|---|---|---|
| Policy and accountability | Black legislative caucuses, attorneys, civil rights organizations, and grassroots groups | Caucuses review the framework, convene communities and agencies, and pursue sponsorship and hearings. Attorneys review agreements and safeguards. Community organizations document priorities and track commitments. |

| Area | Participants | Assignment |
|---|---|---|
| Business and funding | Black chambers of commerce, small businesses, banks, credit unions, financial professionals, family offices, foundations, farmers, cooperatives, unions, and trades | Chambers organize businesses and recruit willing pilot merchants. Businesses identify equipment, inventory, staffing, training, and supplier needs. Financial participants coordinate funding and settlement readiness with SOLN Central Bank. Farmers, cooperatives, unions, and trades identify supply and workforce capacity. |
| Community and services | Families, faith leaders, congregations, healthcare and housing teams, contractors, seniors, disability advocates, caregivers, and African and Caribbean community organizations | Document needs, organize volunteers, develop housing and wellness projects, and involve residents and caregivers in designing accessible services. |
| Education and communications | HBCUs, educators, researchers, students, technology and cybersecurity teams, media, creators, artists, historians, fraternities, sororities, and professional associations | Teach from the source documents, preserve the historical record, build secure reporting tools, organize mentors and chapters, and publish documented results. |

Each participating organization is asked to name one liaison and submit one project with a responsible team, budget, timeline, and measurable community benefit. The coordination plan calls for two meetings per month and a monthly report to report@stateoflocnation.com covering completed work, results, obstacles, and next steps.

3.4 Write-in voter access

At Hammond Park, I observed that the write-in notice was missing when polls opened and was brought out while I was voting. A voter arriving at opening should be able to find the candidate information before casting a ballot. My account documents what I observed at Hammond Park. The county-by-county review will separately record which certified lists I verified online and where I am still seeking confirmation.

4. Proposed implementation and oversight

The legislative proposal describes four program functions. The table identifies what each function would do and what evidence future issues would use to track it.

| Program function | Proposed mechanism | Evidence to track |
|---|---|---|
| Claims and restitution | Define eligible claimants and qualifying injuries, review evidence, record determinations and awards, provide an appeals process, and maintain an auditable claims registry. | Published eligibility criteria, registry safeguards, determinations, awards, and appeals. |
| Land and property restoration | Consider compensation, voluntary restoration agreements, title assistance, and community land programs. | Documented decisions, signed agreements, and completed transfers where applicable. |
| Community economic restoration | Support housing stabilization, small businesses, workforce education, infrastructure, access to financial services, and community-controlled development. | Published award criteria, conflict-of-interest controls, award records, and project outcomes. |
| Finance, LND, and oversight | Develop the proposed funding, conversion, accounting, and settlement processes. | Written terms, pilot procedures, and verifiable test or settlement records when available. |

SOLN proposes funding its initiatives with LND directly or through conversion to U.S. dollars, using a proposed program reference rate of 750 U.S. dollars per LND. SOLN Central Bank's next step is to seek engagement with the Pan-African Payment and Settlement System (PAPSS) and the Caribbean Payment and Settlement System (CAPSS) to explore pilot arrangements. Preparations include documenting participant acceptance, onboarding, pricing, wallet support, any applicable conversion, and settlement terms. Future issues will track outreach, written agreements, testing, and any authorized launch as separate milestones.

5. Next issue and reporting commitments

The 2026 Year-End Issue is expected at the end of December 2026. It will update the countyby-county record of certified write-in list postings, document follow-up on SOLN's H.R. 40 amendment proposal, and report which organizations named liaisons, submitted projects, or began delivery. It will also record progress on LND pilot preparation and PAPSS/CAPSS outreach. Where monthly records are available, the issue will identify the responsible team, what it completed, the evidence of progress, and its next action for early 2027.

References

1. United Nations General Assembly. Declaration of the Trafficking of Enslaved Africans and Racialized Chattel Enslavement of Africans as the Gravest Crime against Humanity. A/RES/80/250, adopted March 25, 2026. United Nations Digital Library 2. U.S. House of Representatives. Commission to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans Act. H.R. 40, 119th Congress, as introduced. GovInfo 3. Clement, Christina Loren. What an Amended HR 40 Looks Like: The SOLN Restitution Act 2024. Publication listing 4. State of Loc Nation Global Public Benefit Corporation. State of Loc Nation Organizational Map. Organizational map